Marriss House is not just a building, it is a portal to the future. It changes lives, nurtures talent and makes people bloom. It exists at the axis-point where good people morph into great health professionals, who will spend the rest of their lives saving, healing and improving patients' lives. How inspiring is that?

If this were a movie, Marriss House would be a shimmering, glittering Temple but the truth is, it looks more like a 1970's car park. So, how do we tell people that this dowdy building is the beating heart of our community? The epicentre of health? A place where all are welcome?

- What would you do to make Marriss House seem more welcoming?
- How can we share the wonderful work that we do? In a way that is accessible to all?

- How can our team lead the way in defining the nursing identity? Because if we can't define what we do, how can we share it with others?
- How do we tell people, "Who we are and what we do?"
